Check Soils for Double Crop Soybeans

Many producers maximize use of land, equipment, and other resources through a system of double-cropping of soybeans and small grains. Usually the time interval between crops isn't adequate to allow for collecting soil samples, securing analysis, and applying the needed lime and other materials that may be needed. Sampling soils and securing tests may reveal critical need for lime, especially following the high rainfall of the past 2 years. Collecting soil samples in growing or standing small grains is one sure way to beat the rush of seasonal work and make sure if lime is needed.

Too, this will allow time for ordering the needed liming material and getting it applied between harvest of the small grain and the time soybeans would be damaged by spreader operation over the field. The liming material will be effective as a surface application, unless removed from the field by flowing water or other means.

Research results indicate benefit to soybeans from liming, up to 6.2 to 6.5 pH. Soil reaction in the mid to lower 5's of pH will severely restrict yields. Yield increases of 15 to 20 bushels per acre have resulted from liming to improve pH from about 5.2 to 6.5. Measured by today's ratio of lime costs to soybean prices, the increases normally expected become rather astronomical returns. With the expected price for soybeans, lime use is very profitable where needed. The important consideration is to determine needs before planting time to enable spreading in time for soybeans to benefit from the lime application.

Soil Record sheets and boxes for use in soil sampling are available from The County Extension Office.

Finds Rare Petrified Wood

Mr. David M. Wood, Sr. of Route 3, Appomattox, stopped by the TIMES-VIRGINIAN office on May 9th with what he thought was a piece of petrified wood found at Piney Mountain Fire Tower. Mr. Wood was on his way to Lynchburg College to have the Biology Department check this out.

Since that time, Wood has received a letter from the college verifying that it is petrified wood; the replacement material most probably is silica with some kind of iron ore (limonite) giving the rock its yellowish or yellowish-brown color. He was also advised that this sort of thing is quite rare in Piedmont Virginia.
